Excerpt: .beings are, from all the changes and temptations of life, there will be as little opportunity to test their characters and try their hearts.--And the world of woe, a place from which all salutary restraint and good influences are withdrawn, will be no better adapted to the purposes of trial, than heaven. This obviously is the place, from the very adaptation of it, where sinners are left to curse their God and look upward--left to fill up unchecked the measure of their sins--where they will bite and gnaw their tongues for pain, and yet not repent of their evil deeds. If there was to be a probation beyond the grave for any portion of mankind, we might expect that some place would be prepared and fitted, as this world is, for such a purpose. But we hear of no such place, on the other side of the river of death--none, save the resting place of God s people on the one hand, and the prison of despair and abandonment on the other. We are constrained to believe, therefore, that all the probation which any of the children of men will ever enjoy, is confined within the limits of the present life. It may be objected again to the views which have been advanced, that all good influences do not seem to be withdrawn from the world of woe--that in one instance, at least, the gospel was preached there, and preached by no less a...
